Hi, This is Bill here again. I just watched your video on how to upgrade to Windows Vista from Windows XP and I have a few questions for you. You mentioned that the safest thing to do in your situation was to back up your data. Well I'm trying to do just that right now. My problem is that when I start Windows Vista it won't connect to the local network, even though everything is working fine with Windows XP. I should mention that I have a wireless network configured to broadcast a samba share, and that is the only network connection I have set up, so it's not that. My modem/router, which is a NetGear FVS9001, is receiving an internet connection and I can ping, but

Of course, such a law might be declared void, because of the previous legislation. Yet this matter must be settled by another law. Is it not therefore evident that any law is twice legislated? (2) But this is a pardonable error. A law can be "reversed," for the purpose of permitting it to have effect previously, and then only for that purpose. This can be proved easily. But the law itself has never been "revoked" at all; that is, in effect it has been never repealed. (3) At the time of writing this treatise, the English constitution is called the "great" constitution. It is of course easily corrected. Most of the deeds of the British cabinet are rev
