Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method for starting a home internal combustion engine, in particular, a household, garden, or other type of engine. More specifically, the invention is concerned with a method of initiating combustion of a fuel mixture in a closed system or chamber, such as a furnace, water heater, or other closed chamber in which combustion is desirable, but combustion does not spontaneously occur, and with which fuel is fed to the combustion chamber by a variety of means, including rotation of a reciprocating engine. B. Discussion of the Prior Art A great many different types of engines are well known in the prior art. The engines can be split into two distinct categories of engine, such as a closed system engine and an open system engine. The first category of engine is a closed system engine, such as a furnace, in which combustion of fuel is desirable, but does not spontaneously occur. The second category of engine is an open system engine, such as an automobile engine, in which combustion does spontaneously occur. The closed system engines can be further subdivided into two distinct types, namely, gas engines and liquid fuel engines. Gas engines are those that contain a propellant, typically a gas, such as a fuel/air mixture, in a closed chamber, such as a furnace, in which combustion will occur when ignited by some means. For instance, a combustion ignition source can be used to ignite the propellant to burn the propellant in the closed chamber. For example, a flame from an igniting means, such as a match, can be used to ignite a small pellet of propellant in a furnace. However, gas engines do not use liquid fuel, which requires an open combustion system in which combustion spontaneously occurs in the open system engine. On the other hand, liquid fuel engines include an open system engine, such as an automobile engine, in which combustion does spontaneously occur when liquid fuel is fed
