A design for the earrings will be available soon, and the team can be contacted on 07865 659340. The artificial nails were created using industrial-strength acetone, a special plasma-treatment process which removes residual chemicals before they can leach into the nailbed. The new technology means that nails can be re-applied on site rather than shipped to a factory for repair. The nails are being developed for those living with burns, eczema and other skin conditions which make it difficult to wear natural nails, but are also ideal for cosmetic surgery patients. "We have pioneered industrial nail technology and are delighted to have this exciting opportunity to develop artificial nails for those living with a long-term skin condition," said Professor Sir Roger Cottle, President of the British Association of Dermatologists and Skin Therapists, who nominated Lien Tze Teoh and his team for the award. "These nails, which we have developed in response to high demand from our patients, are proving very popular not just in the UK but worldwide. "They provide patients with a better experience of getting their make-up on, which is only made possible with a strong, long-lasting artificial nail that lasts several months, rather than several days." Director of Professional Services at the British Association of Dermatologists and Skin Therapists Sally-Anne Fox, who nominated the team for the award, said the artificial nails were "life-changing". "Skin conditions like burns and dermatitis often have an impact on people's lives, and it can be challenging and time-consuming to go through daily application of nail polish," she said. "These new artificial nails have allowed our patients to enjoy a new way to fashion and perfect their beautiful nails. "The technology could also be used to improve the experience of cosmetic surgery patients who are treated with artificial nails to enhance the aesthetic and cosmetic results." The British Association of Dermatologists and Skin Therapists Innovation and Development Team - which includes Lien Tze Teoh - were presented with the award at the
