“Real-life movement, realistic animations and fluid dribbling are now a part of FIFA,” said Adam Bhatti, FIFA’s Development Director. “We’ve seen a huge uptake of our player motion capture technology, which was successfully used to immerse players in real-life environments. It enabled us to create detailed environments that used the same movements as our players.” How does it work? A highly-advanced and calibrated set of motion capture cameras and sensors measure the movement of players. Each marker or node is placed in the correct position on the player’s body, such as upper arms, upper legs, and head, which is tracked in real time throughout the match. As the player moves throughout the pitch, the data is recorded, digitized and converted into player animations that play back on the pitch in a dynamic environment. The resulting position and movement of the various parts of the players’ body is shared with players around the world and captured in high-definition. What does it mean for players? “What we’ve tried to do in FIFA 22 is to really bridge the gap between the two worlds of video game and live-action sports, and to create the real feeling of playing a football match,” said Albert Riera, Senior Producer, FIFA Team. “The HyperMotion technology is a real step forward in achieving this goal, and it means we can capture a wider range of player movements from all the way up the pitch.” What does it mean for FIFA fans? “FIFA is built on real-world player movements, so there’s something extremely satisfying about seeing a player run off and collect the ball and lift it over an opponent,” said Albert Riera, Senior Producer, FIFA Team. “It means you can enjoy the feeling of control of a real-life movement. The technology also helps improve and optimize the feeling of tackling when players move around the pitch, in every direction, and at high speed.” For an in-depth look at the technology, watch the behind-the-scenes video below. Developed by Find out more about how FIFA Player Motion technology, and how the teams behind the scenes used it in the video below.
