Aya is going through a really hard situation. Each puzzle is very difficult, but not impossible to solve. Each puzzle has a mechanism that can be combined with another puzzle to create a much more complicated problem to solve. In addition to the puzzles there are different types of death traps that you must avoid. You can grab items with the grappling hook and use them in your environment to save your progress. See if you can finish the game with Aya's survival. Gameplay Features: Aya Helplessly wanders around this dark and sinister world searching for a way out, but there are a lot of dangerous situations awaiting her. Help her survive this hostile environment. Aya's Journey is a 2D sidescroller puzzle game with many different interactive mechanics. Each puzzle is difficult, but not impossible. In this game you have to control the character through various obstacles, for example jumping over sawblades, avoid spikes, bullets, lasers and many more things that might kill you. The controls are easy, use Spacebar to Jump and the Control Keys to move the character left and right. Aya's biggest fears are constantly haunting her and she will eventually have to face them. with a Love of Ag. Menu Month: October 2015 The last few years it has become very clear that the future of food will be largely dependent on the rise of technological advances. We've seen that many food companies are experimenting with blockchain technologies in the hopes of improving their operations. At Farmtastic, we care about the integrity of our food. Any new food product, whether it's apple cider vinegar or ground up insects, must comply with food standards set by regulatory agencies, just like any other food product. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA) has strict rules for what goes into food. For example, cars are required to meet minimum fuel standards. If a car doesn't meet those minimums, you could get fined. The same standards are applied to food. Any food grade ingredient or material (from fertilizer to packaging) has to meet specific regulatory standards. These standards may impact the way certain companies conduct their business. You don't want to be investing your money in a business that produces pesticide laden food only to find out later that the ingredients are contaminated. Blockchain makes it possible for farmers and food producers to conduct business in a way that breaks free from these standards and protects their reputation. In a traditional transaction, a farmer may wish to purchase some fertilizer from a company and transport the fertilizer to his or her farm. During transport, the fertilizer can deteriorate due to packaging materials that the farmer must adhere to. If the farmer discovered this problem after the fact, the farmer would have to plead with the company and prove that the original specifications were met. This is not an ideal scenario. The company that the farmer purchased his fertilizer from only cared about their bottom line. They were not performing any inspections and did not really care how the fertilizer was handled between the farm and the shipping warehouse. Performing inspections is a costly and time consuming endeavor for companies and it's hard to know whether companies are being honest with you. Even if inspections were conducted, it is difficult to determine if the product is actually stored properly. Blockchain technology eliminates these problems by recording data in a blockchain and only those involved with the transaction can see the data. Data can be analyzed with simple Python scripts if a new issue arises. Once the data is verified, it is stored on a worldwide network of computers called a blockchain. As long as the computer is connected to the blockchain, any change in the data can be recorded and verified. Computers that are not on
