DOWNLOAD PDF @ www.freepdf-files.com..The primary objectives of this proposal are to: (1) demonstrate the mechanisms by which human intestinal intraepithelial lymphocytes (i-IEL) produce soluble mediators that regulate antigen specific immune responses in the intestinal mucosa, and (2) demonstrate how these mediators are regulated and that the corresponding receptor and molecular targets are identified. The laboratory has developed a reproducible model of human intestinal mucosal inflammation in which disease is induced in the small and large intestine by oral antigen delivery. This study will focus on i-IEL and the biologic function of their mediators, termed proinflammatory cytokines. These experiments are the outgrowth of two major discoveries from our laboratory; first, we showed that i-IEL produce factors that down regulate antigen-specific immune responses in the intestine and second, we discovered that these mediators are released during antigen-specific T cell responses. i-IEL are critical to the mucosal immune system. We recently showed that activation of i-IEL, a key event for protective mucosal immunity, can be reproduced by oral delivery of antigen. The production of anti-inflammatory and proinflammatory cytokines by i-IEL will be studied. In vivo and in vitro models of human intestinal mucosal inflammation will be used to study these mechanisms. The specific aims are to demonstrate that i-IEL: (1) produce cytokines in vitro in response to antigen-specific T cell activation, and (2) produce cytokines in vivo in the intestinal mucosa in response to local antigen challenge. We have evidence that i-IEL in vitro produce TNFalpha and IL-13, and that IL-13
